

SOCIETY

THE DOT PREPAREDNESS

After the boys had had their swim, they went through a setting-up exercise, which left them in a fine glow and with sharp appetites. It was then that the instructor showed the boys that his plan of preparedness was not in the least a joke.

"You will notice," said he, "that we have been up for an hour and a half, and not one of you has made any effort to get his own breakfast. But that was my scheme, for I have kept you all busy. And if you will just peek in the cabin, you will see that I have thoughtfully provided a —"

To find out what the instructor provided, join the dots with a pencil line, beginning with dot No. 1 and taking them in numerical order. Then cut out and paste each day's picture in a scrapbook, and when the last one is printed, you will have "The Dot Preparedness" story complete in permanent book form.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Tom Morrisey, a young printer, is on his way home from work when Henry Rokeason, son of a local politician, who is running away from the police, stumbles and falls at his feet. Tom lifts him up, and just then the policeman takes them both by the collar. Henry charges Tom with being involved, and they are both taken to the station house, from which Henry is released on the appearance of his father, while Tom is kept locked up and in a next morning. He pursues his industrious course and is able to buy a little cottage, in which he, his mother and his sister, Mabel, live happily. His place backs up to Rokeason's huge grounds. Young Rokeason shows that he retains his animosity toward Tom, and an employee tells Mabel he has orders to shoot her little dog if it strays into Rokeason's grounds.

As he bent to his garden work, Tom heard two men's voices in conversation.

"Bring out old Champion Colborn," Tom presently heard Henry order the kennel man. "I want to look at that barbed-wire scratch on his shoulder."

Tom, turning his head, saw the kennel man open a heavy wire door in one of the inclosures. Out trotted a massive white bulldog, perhaps eighty pounds in weight, huge muscles bulging through the surface of his glossy snowy hide.

At sight of his master, the great dog bounded forward, wagging his stumpy tail in joyous greeting, leaping up at Henry for caresses. His playful paws brushed against Henry's flannel trousers, leaving dusty marks on the white cloth.

Henry, with an exasperated curse at the affectionate brute's awkwardness, swung back one buckskin-clad foot and delivered a tremendous kick on the dog's throat. Both father and son chuckled with laughter as Champion Colborn tumbled prone into the dust, under the cruel impact, and then limped crestfallen back into his kennel.

"Id sooner cut my hand off than treat a loving dumb animal like that," mused Tom, adding, "Well, it's none of my business. But I'm glad Hutch has a home where people pet him instead of kicking him."

He went on with his planting. A minute later, Mabel emerged from the cottage. Calling out a cheery good-by to her brother, she walked down the short garden path to the street gate. Tom's yellow puppy had followed her from the house and now frisked along in front of her, gleeful in the prospect of a walk. But at the gate she sent him back, calling:

"No, no, Hutchie! Go back to master. You can't walk with me this evening."

Chagrined, but optimistic, the puppy obeyed. He trotted over to Tom, the man patted him on the head, then went on working. The puppy, finding no one had time to play with him, decided to go for a walk on his own account.

He ran to the gate. Mabel had neglected to close it tightly. A few scientific butts of Hutch's furry nose pushed it open wide enough for him to wiggle out.

Mabel was no longer in sight on Hudson Lane, having turned the corner a block above. Hutch cantered on in happy search for adventure. He was not long in finding it.

Tom heard Henry Rokeason say in amused excitement to the kennel man: "Let Champion Colborn out again."

Quick! And open the gate in the hedge that leads into Hudson Lane."

To his father, Rokeason explained: "That mongrel yellow mutt of Morrissey's is out on the sidewalk. Watch some fun!"

Tom jumped to his feet and ran to his own gate. But, fast as he ran, Champion Colborn ran faster. Tom was just in time to see the gigantic white bulldog dart out into Hudson Lane and fling himself upon the unsuspectingly frisking little mongrel puppy.

There was a deep-throated growl, followed at once by an almost human scream of mortal agony. Then, in response to his master's laughing summons, the bulldog jogged back into the Rokeason grounds.

On the sidewalk lay a pitifully moveless little mass of yellow fluff. Hutch had met with a mercifully swift fate, and at the hands—or rather the jaws—of a thoroughbred. Champion Colborn, at a single snap, had broken the little fellow's neck.
